

Beaverbrook's Title Is Renounced by Son

Associated Press

Max Aitken

Special to The New York Times

LONDON, June 11 — Max Aitken, who assumed the title and inherited the newspaper empire of Lord Beaverbrook, declared tonight that he had renounced his title. His father died Tuesday.

"The title was earned and won by my father," the 54-year-old Mr. Aitken said. "He brought on it a unique distinction which belongs to him alone."

"Certainly in my lifetime there will only be one Lord Beaverbrook," Mr. Aitken added.

As chairman of Beaverbrook Newspapers, Ltd. Mr. Aitken controls The Daily Express, the Sunday Express and The Evening Standard.

The late Lord Beaverbrook himself had second thoughts about the title. After he became the first Baron Beaverbrook in 1917, he expressed regret that by moving into the House of Lords he had been removed from the center of political power, the House of Commons.

File: Aitken, Max
File: Beaverbrook, Lord

Beaverbrook's Title Is Renounced by Son

Associated Press

Max Aitken

Special to The New York Times

LONDON, June 11 — Max Aitken, who assumed the title and inherited the newspaper empire of Lord Beaverbrook, declared tonight that he had renounced his title. His father died Tuesday.

"The title was earned and won by my father," the 54-year-old Mr. Aitken said. "He brought on it a unique distinction which belongs to him alone."

"Certainly in my lifetime there will only be one Lord Beaverbrook," Mr. Aitken added.

As chairman of Beaverbrook Newspapers, Ltd. Mr. Aitken controls The Daily Express, the Sunday Express and The Evening Standard.

The late Lord Beaverbrook himself had second thoughts about the title. After he became the first Baron Beaverbrook in 1917 he expressed regret that by moving into the House of Lords he had been removed from the center of political power, the House of Commons.